5 (Only in sing.) Native intellectual power of an exalted type, such as is attributed to those who are esteemed greatest in any department of art, speculation, or practice ; instinctive and extraordinary capacity for imaginative creation, original thought, invention, or discovery. Often contrasted with talent.

This sense, which belongs also to F genie, Ger genie, appears to have been developed in the 18th c. It is not recognized in Johnson's Dictionary) In sense 4 the word had come to be applied with especial frequency to the kind of intellectual power which is displayed in literature, and when in this application 'genius', as native endowment, came to be contrasted with the aptitudes that can be acquired by study, the approach to the modern sense was often very close The further development of meaning was probably influenced by association with senses 1 and 2, which suggested that the word had an especial fitness to denote that particular kind of intellectual power which has the appearance of proceeding from a supernatural inspiration or possession, and which seems to arrive at its results in an unpremeditated and miraculous manner This sense, which originated in England, came into great prominence in Germany, and gave the designation of Genieperiode to the epoch in German literature otherwise known as the 'Storm and Drang' period. Owing to the influence of Ger literature in the present century, this is now the most familiar sense of the Eng word, and usually colours the other senses It was by the Ger writers of the 18th c that the distinction between 'genius' and 'talent', which had some foundation in Fr usage, was sharpened into the strong antitheses which is now universally current, so that the one term is hardly ever defined without reference to the other . The difference between genius and talent has been formulated very variously by different writers, but there is general agreement in regarding the former as the higher of the two, as 'creative' and 'original', and as achieving its results by instinctive inspiration and spontaneous activity, rather than by processes which admit of being distinctly analyzed

Talent and genius are not merely different, they are in polar opposition to each other Talent is intellectual power of every kind, which acts and manifests itself through knowing The active forces Genius is that much rarer species of intellectual power which is derived from the genial nature—from the spirit of suffering and enjoying profoundly The passive and the active brain is a function of the passive nature 1858 Carlyle *Frederk. Gent (dgent), sb [Short for GENTLEMAN] = GENTLEMAN 15 : now only vulgar, exc. as applied derisively to men of the vulgar and pretentious class who are supposed to use the word

Early prose examples are doubtful, as they may represent only the graphic abbreviation which was formerly common, 'Gents' may be an editorial misreading for 'Gent'= gentlemen Early in the present century the word was colloquial and slightly jocular, about 1840 its use came to be regarded as a mark of low breeding

Genteel (dgentī'l), a and sb. Forms 6–8 gentile, 8 gentil, 7– genteel [A re-adoption, at the end of the 16th c, of F. gentil, which had been previously adopted in the 13th c, and had assumed the form GENTLE.

The re-adoption first took place in the form gentile, distinguished from GENTILE (=non Jewish) by retaining the F pronunciation of the i and the stress on the last syllable It is probable that it was originally pronounced to retain the F nasal sound in the first syll , hence the vulgar pronunciation represented by the spelling 'jonteel', which occurs in comic literature of the early 19th c The fully anglicized spelling genteel came in at the end of the 17th, see also GENTEF, which corresponds more nearly to the pronunciation of the F word, in which the t is silent Another attempt to render the F. sound is jantee

A few years before the middle of the 19th c the word was much ridiculed as being characteristic of those who are possessed with a dread of being taken for 'common people', or who attach exaggerated importance to supposed marks of social superiority In seriously laudatory use it may now be said to be a vulgarism in educated language it has always a sarcastic or at least playful colouring.

Genteel (dgentī'l), a and sb. Forms 6–8 gentile, 8 gentil, 7– genteel [A re-adoption, at the end of the 16th c, of F. gentil, which had been previously adopted in the 13th c, and had assumed the form GENTLE.

The re-adoption first took place in the form gentile, distinguished from GENTILE (=non Jewish) by retaining the F pronunciation of the i and the stress on the last syllable It is probable that it was originally pronounced to retain the F nasal sound in the first syll , hence the vulgar pronunciation represented by the spelling 'jonteel', which occurs in comic literature of the early 19th c The fully anglicized spelling genteel came in at the end of the 17th, see also GENTEF, which corresponds more nearly to the pronunciation of the F word, in which the t is silent Another attempt to render the F. sound is jantee

A few years before the middle of the 19th c the word was much ridiculed as being characteristic of those who are possessed with a dread of being taken for 'common people', or who attach exaggerated importance to supposed marks of social superiority In seriously laudatory use it may now be said to be a vulgarism in educated language it has always a sarcastic or at least playful colouring.

Highest genus (L. summum genus), one which does not become subordinated as species to a higher genus; subaltern genus, one which is also a species of some higher genus

2 Zool and Bot. A classificatory group comprehending a number of species (sometimes a single species) possessing certain common structural characteristics more than those of any other genus

The determination of genera out of what characteristics are to be considered generic, is more or less arbitrary and empirical, and admits of continual alteration according to current knowledge of facts and ideas of classification in the respective sciences The genus ranks next under the family or sub family, and above the species; it is sometimes divided into subgenus and section The generic names (always in Latin or considered as Latin) together form the scientific proper name of an animal or plant, the generic name standing first and being written with no initial capital To be zoological in the genus Homo is popularly understood as a somewhat flippant or jocular synonym for 'mankind' or 'the human race'

The med L word was used, perhaps for the first time, by Richard de Bury (14th c) in the peculiar sense 'science of earthly things', applied to the study of law as distinguished from the arts and sciences which are concerned with the works of God. In 1687 geologia appears as the title of a work in Italian by F Stelliola, intended to prove that the 'influence' ascribed by astrologers to the stars, really proceeded from the earth itself. A work entitled Geologia Norwegica, containing a description of Hecla, is referred to in 1686 by Phil Vasfordshire in 145, but so far as is at present known, the use of the word as a name for a distinct branch of physical science occurs first in English]

b Geometrical ratio (now usually ratio simply, as the expression arithmetical r. is obsolete): that kind of relation between two quantities which is expressed by dividing the first by the second; the quotient expressing this. (The term survives chiefly in the phrase at a geometrical ratio, loosely used for in geometrical progression.) Geometrical proportion: a proportion which involves an equality of geometrical ratio in its two parts, as 1 : 3 :: 4 : 12. Geometrical progression, a series in which the ratio between the successive quantities is constant, as 1 : 3 · 9 · 27 · 81, etc.

Arithmetical progression, † proportion, † ratio, etc. (see ARITHMETICAL a) relate to differences instead of quotients. The term geometrical points to the fact that problems involving multiplication were originally dealt with by geometry and not by arithmetic Geotropism (dʒɪ,ɒtrŏpĭz'm) Bot. [f. as prec + -ISM First used in Ger. form geotropismus by A B Frank Beitr. z. Pflanzenphysiol. (1868).] A collective term for the phenomena of irritability presented by various parts of plants in relation to the action of gravity Positive geotropism : the tendency (of roots, etc.) to grow towards the centre of the earth. Negative g. : the tendency (of stems, etc.) to grow away from the centre of the earth.

By C and F. Darwin (1880) the word was used in a narrower sense, as synonymous with the ' positive geotropism ' of other writers, the term Aerotropism being substituted for ' negative geotropism '. Diageotropism, the tendency (of leaves) to grow at right angles to the vertical, is a third variety of ' geotropism ' in the original (and still prevalent) wider sense of the word

1875 Bennett & Dyer Sachs' Bot 728 The positive or negative character of geotropism depends as little as that of heliotropism on the morphological nature of the organ

1880 F Darwin in Nature XXXIII 179 The phenomena might result from the ordinary forms of heliotropism and geotropism acting in concert.

A compound of the word which appears in Eng as Falcon, the origin of the first element is disputed, but the prevailing view both among Germanic and Romanic philologists now is that, while the recorded forms in the Teut tongues are adopted from Fr, the ultimate source is the OHG. gīr vulture (MHG. gīr, mod Ger geier), f the root gīr- in OHG girī, girī greedy. The suggestion that the med L. gyrofalco is derived from gyrus gyre, and refers to the circling ' con-entric flight of the bird, was made by Gerald de Barri (Giraldus Cambrensis) as early as 1188 (Top Hib ed Brewer, I 220) A treatise on hunting by the Emperor Frederic II (De arte venandi cum avibus, IV xv 155, ed 1596) in which the word is said to be either from the Ger vocative, lord, or from the Ger name sacred The latter suggestion was probably based on the Germanic term falco used denoting a kind of hawk , but according to modern scholars falco in this use (Fr. Sp., Pg falcon) sb does not mean ' sacred,' but is an old pejorative term for a bird. In the 18th c. hierofalco was adopted by ornithologists (Aldrovandus, Gesner) as the correct Latin form, probably from the observation that it goes sometimes represents ĭ hiero- in gerarchia, hierarchy), and it is still used as the scientific name of a sub-genus of the genus Falco The view of some recent etymologists, that OF gerfaucon represents a popular L hierofalco*, and that the first element of this is from Gr τερᾰξ hawk is very improbable]

German (dʒɜ·mǽn), a[2] and sb[2] Also 6 germayne, 6–7 germaine, germane. [ad. L Germān-us, used, as adj and sb, as the designation of persons belonging to a group of related peoples inhabiting central and northern Europe, and speaking the dialects from which the 'Germanic' or 'Teutonic' languages have been developed.

The name does not appear to have been applied to these peoples by themselves, but was probably borrowed from Celtic sources A view widely held is that it was the name given by the Gauls to their neighbours, the Celtic derivations suggested are from Cl. gair neighbour (Zeuss) and from Irish gairm battle-cry (Owen Pughe); according to Mullenhoff, Germani was originally the name of a group of Celtic peoples in north eastern Gaul, was transferred from these to their Teutonic conquerors, and afterwards extended to all the Teutonic peoples]

The pronunciation (dʒɜ·mǽn), for which cf clerk, sergeant, Hertford, was formerly fashionable, but now survives only as dial or vulgar

In English use the word does not occur until the 16th c; the sb. appearing in our quots earlier than the adj. The older designations were Almain and Dutch (Dutchman), the latter, however, was wider in meaning

[a ON. geta (gat, getinn, getenn) to get, obtain, to beget, also, to guess (Sw gissa, Da. gisse to be able or willing, MSw. gata, Da. gætte to guess) = OE. -getan only in the compounds a-, be-, for-, ofer-, on-, under-getan. see BEGET, FORGET), OFris. (ur-, for-)yeta, OS. (bi-, far-)getan (MDu ver-gheten, Du ver-geten), OHG gezzan, kezzan (once in pple keʒʒenḍ, ' adeptus', otherwise only in bi-, ant-, ir-, ir-gezzan ; MHG. er-, ver-gezzen, mod G ver-gessen)), Goth. (bi-)gitan –OTeut getan, gat-, getum, getono-* The OAr. root ghed, ghod 'to seize', 'take hold of', is found also in L. prædа (–præ-hdа*) booty, prædium an estate, perh also in hedera ivy (literally the ' clinger ') ; and with inserted nasal in L prehendere to catch, lay hold of, Gr χανδάνω (aor. ἔχαδον) to hold, contain, to be able.

Of the compounds of getan which existed in OE. (see above), only begetan and forgetan survive in the modern language, and the normal equivalents beyet and foryet were displaced in later ME. in favour of BEGET and FORGET. Gower is app. the last author who employs beyet ; foryet disappears in the 15th c. except in Sc, where it is not yet extinct This change was prob due to the influence of the simple verb. Conversely, the solitary example in MS. of yeten without prefix (sense 26) may be referred to the influence of bigeten.

The forms of the pa. pple. retaining the original vowel (ON getenn) are found in literature down to the 16th c, and in the north midlands and Yorkshire getten is still the dialectal form From the beginning of the English history of the vb, however, it has, like most verbs with ME open e in the present stem, tended to assume the conjugation of vbs of the e, a, o series (originally confined to nasals and in a liquid); thus in the 13th c. we find geten, got, goten parallel with stelen, stal, stolen In the 16th c. the pa t was often got, by assimilation to the pa. pple., in the 17th c. this became the usual form, though gat is used in the Bible of 1611 and still occurs in archaistic poetry. In England the form gotten of the pa. pple. is almost obsolete (exc. dial) having been superseded by got, in U.S literature gotten is still very common, although Webster 1864 gives it as 'obsolescent'.]

[Etymology and primary sense uncertain; a reduplicated formation such as is commonly found in words of contemptuous signification. If the original application be to a musical instrument, the word may have been invented as an imitation of the sound, cf. Du gegagen to 'hee-haw'. On the other hand, the picture many notion was that of 'a gaudy object'; the suggestion may have come from the νb Gaw, with its variants or synonyms gow, gew. It is not impossible that the word as applied to a musical instrument may be an independent formation. The mod Du. giegauw, recorded once in the sense 'flourish, scalloped border', and now preserved only in a phrase of obscure origin belonging to the game of mercels, is supposed by the Du. lexicographers to be an adaptation of the Eng. word. The commonly accepted view has been that the earliest form, which is written giugoune (Ancren Riwle) should be read as geiugoune, and that the word is a reduplicated formation from the νb Give. But this supposition would be identical with Giff gaff and the MDu. ghiveghave, of which a single example is known. But if this were the etymology, the word would have 3, not g, in the southern texts of the Ancren Rewle (unless indeed these texts have been transcribed from an original in northern dialect) further, the proposed explanation does not account plausibly for the recorded senses, and it is doubtful whether the assumed development of giugoune into gugaw (15th c.), guggaw (16th c.), gewgaw, is phonetically possible. The possibility is that these two Gewgaw are distinct.]

Although the word is known only in the WGer langs (in all of which it is found with substantially identical meaning), it appears to be of pre-Teut formation The sense of the pre-Teut khoindos*, if the ordinary view of its etymological relations be correct, should be 'fury, anger'; cf. Skr hiḍas neut anger, Zend zaiδda- ugly; the root khais-, khoi- appears with cognate sense in ON geisa to rage, Goth usgaisjan to terrify (see Gast v); outside Teut the derivatives seem to point to a primary sense 'to wound, tear, pull to pieces '
The OE form gást is constant in the Exeter Book, and occurs 49 times in the Hatton MS and 3 times in the Bodl. MS of Alfred's transl of Gregory's Pastoral Care; it is app not known elsewhere. The occurrence of gǽst- gæist- beside gást = gaistoz* is explained by Sievers (Ags Gram. ed 3) as indicating that the word, though recorded only as masc , was orig a neut -az, -iz stem It would thus correspond formally to the Skr. word quoted above.
The spelling with gh-, so far as our material shows, appears first in Caxton, who was probably influenced by the Flemish ghaest It remained rare until the middle of the 16th c., and was not completely established before about 1590]

† Gig (gig), *v.*1 [? GIG *sb.*1 (sense 1.).] a. intr. ? To dance (sense obscure: see below).

The verb seems literally to denote the action of some kind of 'gig' or whipping-top of peculiar construction, having inside it a smaller 'gig' of the same shape, which was thrown out by the effect of rapid rotation. Hence to gig (out) appears to be used fig with the sense 'to throw out or give rise to (a smaller repetition of itself)'. The DEUS, on the ground of the Dryden quot., have plausibly, but erroneously, explained the transitive v. as meaning 'to engender,' assigning to it a derivation from L. gignere.

Gi·ngerly (dʒɪ·ndʒəlɪ), adv and a [f. ginger (of obscure origin) + -LY²; the adj. appears a few years later than the adv., and may possibly be derived from it.

It seems conceivable that ginger- may represent an adoption of OF genser (gencher, gentir, genser, etc.), properly the conjugated form of gentir (gent, GENT a.), but used also as positive, 'pretty, delicate'. The form presents no difficulty, as the word would naturally be assimilated to GINGER sb. The sense of the OF word agrees closely with that of gingerly in the earliest examples both as adj. and as adv.; though the Eng. word was almost entirely confined to one specific action (perh. as a technical term in dancing), which easily developed into a sense very remote from that of the suggested etymon

Modern students of that any other plausible conjecture has yet been offered. The usual comparison of Sw. dial. gingla, gängla, to totter, is inadmissible, both on account of the sound (dʒ) instead of (g) in both syllables of the Eng. word, and for other reasons. Cf. the derivation from GINGER sb would not account for the 16th c. sense]

Give (giv), v Forms and Inflexions: see below [A Common Teutonic str vb. . OE gefan (geaf, gefon, gifen) OFris. geva, jeva, OS geban (MDu and Du geven, OHG kepan, geban (MHG and G geben), ON gefa Sw gifva, Da give), Goth. gaban —O Teut gabanan*.

By some the root is identified with that of Lith gabėnti to bring, OIrish gabim I take

In OE the strictly West Saxon forms of the infinitive and the pa. pple show the influence of initial g in the substitution of ie (commonly y) for the original e of the root, thus giefan, gifan, gifen for gefan In other dialects the e was normal, except where it passed into eo (northern ea) by w- or u-umlaut, which occurs very frequently, partly owing to the analogy of the 2nd and 3rd pers. sing. pres ind., on the other hand, the regular i of the last mentioned forms is often replaced by the e of the infinitive In midland and southern ME these three main forms are yi, yeve and yeven The third of these is rare, and disappears c 1200 The relation of the other two forms is obscure, as both sometimes occur in the same text e g in Ayenb where the earlier version favours yeve, the later yiven, but neither is consistent In such cases the difference may be merely graphic, as in the case of an indeterminate vowel. Some texts, however, show an exclusive use of one or other of the forms, thus yiven is regular in the Ancren Riwle, while the Ayenbite has yeve throughout The forms with initial guttural are first recorded in the Ormulum (Twelfth cent. midland c 1200), though the forms with 3 are much more frequent (Apparent earlier instances with initial g occur only in MSS which contain late texts.) The g-forms, however, certainly originated in the north (though the want of 12th c northern texts renders direct proof impossible), and, as they do not admit of being like the guttural g readily explained as the products of analogy, it seems most probable that they are due to Scandinavian influence The regular form of the infinitive in early northern texts is yef, geve, which rather corresponds to Sw gifva, Da give, than to ON gefa On the other hand, the pa. pple is at an early date written with e as well as i (gefen, gifen, etc ; see the forms below), and also appears in some contracted forms (geet = gegeten) In the 15th and 16th c the form geve (geef, etc) is common both in English and Scottish writers, Levins (1570) places it along with gyve and yeve as one of the 3 chief forms, but these forms extended themselves gradually to the midland dialects Havelok (c 1300) has, like the Ormulum, both the 3 and the g forms, as does Handlyng Synne (1303) has only the former, but his Chronicle (c 1330), according to the two existing MSS, has always g Langland has both types, and attains perfect alliteration, but Chaucer seems to have always written yeve, yaf, and throughout the greater part of the 15th c the palatal forms predominate in midland (including Anglian) as well as southern writers The MSS of Fortescue have g, which is common also in the London documents after 1430 (Mossbach, Eng Schrift sprache 98) About 1500 the palatal forms disappear entirely from the literary language, and have left only very faint traces in the modern dialects

In the 14th–15th c the pa. pple was sometimes conformed to the analogy of bind, bound, as y-bo with i, -e instead (cf GET), this took place with both the midland and northern forms, but yeven is found more frequently than geven]

B Signification

General sense To make another the recipient of (something that is in the possession, or at the disposal, of the subject).

The verb seems, from the evidence of Goth OHG and OS., to have primarily denoted the placing of a material object in the hands of another person. This application (sense 6 below), however, does not occur in OE., and is not very frequent in ON.; the usual sense (which is found in all the Teut. langs.) is that of freely and gratuitously conferring on a person the ownership of a thing, as an act of bounty. When the notion of 'free gift' was not prominent, the word used was usually Sell. OE. sellan, ON selja), it may be remarked that according to Prof. Cook's glossary to the Northumbrian gospels, the Lat dare is never rendered by ȝeafian or its compounds, but always by (d , ȝe-)sellan In early ME the vb sell became obsolete except in the limited sense L vendere, and its meanings passed over to give. While, however, give thus acquired a widened sense (for the process of development of which cf donner to give ~L dônare to present), it retained at the same time the specific meaning which it had in OF In mod Eng both the wider and the narrower senses are still current, so that while give may be used as an antitheus of sell, pay, or lend, it may also be contextually equivalent to any of those vbs

The construction, wherever nothing is said to the contrary, is with to (unto) or thatwe

I trans To bestow gratuntously

1 To hand over (a thing) as a present; to confer gratuntously the ownership of (some possession) on another person (with or without actual delivery of the object)

Glacier (glæ·sĭəɹ, glæ·ʃĭəɹ). Also 8 glaciere. [a. F. glacier (earlier glaciere), f. glace ice, app. Savoyard word Cf GLETSCHER]

1 A large accumulation or river of ice in a high mountain valley, formed by the gradual descent and consolidation of the snow that falls on the higher ground The receiving mass is often many miles in length, and continues slowly downward until it reaches a point where the temperature is high enough to melt the ice as fast as it descends.

Glagol ˈ (glăg·gŏl) [app a back-formation from next.] The Glagolitic alphabet (In recent Diets)

Glagolitic (glægŏlˈtik), a [ad. mod.L. glagolitic-us (cf. Ger. glagolitisch), f. Serbo-Croat. glagolica (= ts), the Glagolitic alphabet, f. the Common Slavonic glagol, word.

The reason for the name is uncertain, it is conjectured (Miklosich Glagolitische Alphabet in Ersch & Gruber Encycl.) that glagol may in some dialect have had the sense of 'letter', similarly slovo, which in Slavonic generally means 'word', has also that of 'letter' in Croatian

The distinctive epithet of the ancient Slavonic alphabet (called also 'Hieronymian', 'Illyrian', and 'Slovenish') still retained in the service-books of the Roman Catholics of the Slavonic rite in Dalmatia, etc, also used as a designation of the Roman Catholics of the Slavonic rite.

AINSWORTH Rookwood III v, The prince of the high-toby gloaks

Gloam (glōm), sb rare. [Back-formation from GLOAMING.] Twilight, gloaming.

Gloaming (glōˑmĭŋ). Forms · 1 glómung, (æfen-)glommung, 5 glomyng, 5–7 glooming, 8– gloaming. [repr OE. glómung str. fem., f. (on the analogy of rísning EVENING) glóm twilight, prob. f. the Teut root glō-* (see GLOW); the etymological sense would thus seem to be the 'glow' of sunset and sunrise (cf GLOAM sb.?). Since the passage to the recorded sense is not difficult

The vowel of the mod gloaming is anomalous, as OE glómung should normally become glooming. The explanation probably is that the ó was shortened in the compound æfen-glómung (as the following sense seems to suggest usually the case), and that from this compound there was evolved a new sb. glómung, which by normal phonetic development became MHG. glumunge, mod E gloaming. In literary language the word is a comparatively recent adoption from Scottish writers, but it is found in the dialect of Mid Yorks.]
